

The decision by Sinclair Broadcasting to air "Stolen Honor" in the days leading up to the election is a clear example of a corporation abusing the public trust-their ability to use public airwaves to further a partisan political agenda is bad not only for Democrats but for democracy as a whole. The notion that Sinclair has a right to impose their beliefs on the rest of us free of charge (or rather subsidized by our tax dollars) while ignoring their obligation to the public interest is sickening. This is yet another example of how media consolidation is creating a situation where only the wealthy and powerful are able to get their message across, and provides further proof that the FCC must do more to fight consolidation, rather than encouraging it as seems to be the case currently. The FCC has an obligation to the public to do everything in its power to stop this blatant abuse of the public airwaves.
